To Whom It May Concern:

People outside the U.S. often do not realize that libel, even if you can identify the person posting the lie, is not a crime in this country. Instead, it is a civil matter, and winning a lawsuit can be extremely expensive—even if it is a default judgment against an anonymous person who will not step forward to make their claims in the open. Furthermore, even here in the U.S., most people are not aware that the law protects websites that allow the posting of anonymous claims about people, even claims without any proof.

Therefore, when I found myself the subject of a false anonymous accusation on one of these websites, the only option that I could afford was to turn to an online reputation management service. Most companies wanted several thousand dollars up front, with no guarantee that I wouldn't need to pay thousands more just a few months later. RBS Reputation Management asked for monthly fees, so I could change companies quickly if I decided they were not getting the job done. Their prices were considerably more reasonable than their competition's, too, so I gave Lalit Sharma and his team a try.

That was nearly three months ago. I began seeing results during the first week, and in fact, they reached their two-month goal in just a little over one month. I am confident that things will continue to improve going forward, and I am very happy to recommend them to anyone else in need of reputation management services.
